*College celebrates diversity with fashion,
food and song*

Algonquin College's celebration of cultures was a swirl of colour and song this year.

Now in its sixth year, the show featured the tastes and traditions of more than 15 countries.

Visitors enjoyed ethnic food and were entertained by students at the Woodroffe Campus' Market Place food court.

Booths draped in each country's colours, helped welcome guests to learn about their countries.

Culinary students under the guide of chefs John LeBlanc and Sean Edwards served 14 types of appetizers from around the world.

Umut Ozerkan, an international student from Turkey, said he enjoyed the celebration and his only complaint was that it went by too fast.

"It's a wonderful way to educate people on the diversity of our college population," said Kalil. "It's just such a fun way to do it."
